

Lens 1:

Evidence:

- John calling her things like "little girl" shows that she cannot make decisions for herself.
 - I think it the ads are just not reflecting stereotypes about women, but actually helping create those stereotypes.
 - The medical ads seem to do something similar by presenting women as overly emotional or unable to handle normal life without medication.

Where to find?

- Ads aimed at men v. women
 - Examine the language used: "nervous" & "shy"
 - Looking @ the authority in ads.

Lens 2:

- In the Yellow Wallpaper, the narrator knows something is wrong, but then John kills her her interpretation is incorrect.
- One question I had: Who gets to decide when an emotion becomes an illness?
- A weaker argument could be that doctors were trying to treat real disorders even if some advertisements were used as stereotypes. | Who has the ~~the~~ when normal emotion seems objective?

- Women's first-person accounts of medical treatment
- Medical textbooks

Lens? | Diagnosis = Description?

- The most interesting question to me is not whether the medication works, but who decided there was a medical disease to begin with?
- Medication might reduce the visible causes without changing the conditions changing it.

Most compelling lens:

I think the "ignoring the past" clause is the strongest, because it goes beyond the lens and advertisement being sexist and goes into questioning how society defines a problem. It makes me question whether or not some behaviors were medicalized, since they represent how a woman is not expected to act.

Weakest:

I think the "assumption of female weakness" is the least compelling since it's easier to see directly. The imagery is the thing portraying women as mechanical or dependent. The other 2 lenses led to more complex questions.
